still looking at the punctured garments Mr. Moore had the bed-rail almost fitted into the socket, when the other rail like wise severed connections with the headboard, both slipped away, two slats fell out, and then the ticks, slats and bedclothes were in a mass on the floor. "Hang the bed," the detective growl-

Dick laughed and then laving the coa and vest sside, began to help the detective. When the ticks had been tugged away, and the slats removed the floor was clear. Mr. Moore remarked that he would not like to run the risk of sleeping on such a perilous support, but be fore he finished the sentence he stoope over and picked up something.

"What's that ?" asked Dick. The detective did not reply but turn ed the object over and over, examining it closely. Then he handed it to Dick. It was a paper-weight of a familiar pattern. The bottom was a round piece of brass, about three inches in diameter The handle was about thee inches long, and had a contrivance in the end for removing pens. The whole must have weighed a pound and a half. On the rim of the brass plate was pasted a piece of soft leather, and on this was a name in gilt letters, MORTON & KING, BROKERS Here was the tell-tale clue which the nurderer had left behind him.

Mr. Moore went mechanically to the closet, and brought out a mold. The side of the paper-weight fitted the indentation of the wound in the back of Mr. Fessenden's head.

"I am convinced," the detective said "At last!" Dick exclaimed sarcastic-

The detective lost his scruples abou communicating his views to Dick, and talked quite vivaciously. Having found the singular weapon under the bed, and linked the fact to a strong chain of circumstantial evidence, he relinquished his first theory, and grasped the one Dick had advanced. Then he began to explain why he had accused Dick, and had not suspected Fred. He told of the easy manner with which Fred told his story, and Dick heard, for the first time. of Fred's accusations against him. Fred had told Mr. Moore that Dick tried to borrow ten dollars from him a shor time before the murder.

"He lied," said Dick passionately. The consultation lasted till after the dinner hour. Mr. Moore showed Dick the ball that had killed Mr. Fessenden, and he also proved that the rusty pistol on which a when the ball was dro, muzile, it rattled down the pistol which did the killing amaler size. Then came weeks of waiting, helplessness and slow recovery, and very gradually he grew

The little circle of society was all agog again, over a party at the home of Judge Davenport. Gertrude, of course, exerted herself that her guests might enjoy themselves to the fullest, and when the evening came, the house was brilliantly lighted and the subtile hostess was ready to receive the arrivals. A carriage drove up, and John Adams assisted Florence Fisher to alight, and both made their way up the great stone steps. When Florence had removed her wraps, Gertrude whispered something in her ear, and then the two went into an adjoining room, when Gertrude handed Florence

a paper, saying,
"I got that from Helen this morning." Two parallel lines in a column of marriage notices, inclosed a short but decisive piece of news, in a Toledo paper. It read as follows :

"Married—At the residence of Rev. Roderick Payson, 20 Town street, by the same, on Saturday, February 17th, 1883, Mr. Richard Fessenden and Miss Jemi-ma Brown, both of Cincinnati." "Well, Dick is down to calico, isn't he," said Gertrude, when Florence had read the notice. "You know, Miss Brown was his uncle's housekeeper, and she nursed him through the fever, and I suppose he fell in love with her." Florence made some non-committal reply, and the absentees returned to the parlor. There the news was passed around and commented upon generally, and some poked fun at Dick's choice. An hour later the whole company was not a little excited and several formidable smelling-bottles were produced. There was silence for a few minutes. Florence Fisher had fainted. But Florence ence soon revived, and assured those around her that her indisposition was not serious. She had been feeling unwell all evening, she said. But some one took a photograph album from her lap, as she fell back, and observed that it was opened at a cabinet picture of Richard Fessenden.
